Apparently they know more information about me than me, but dare I ask?

devblogs.microsoft.com/oldnewthing/20180904-00

September 4, 2018

Raymond Chen

There's this software services company that retweets content from various technology sites, and they end every one with "Want to learn more? Call us at…". What, so they know more about the subject matter than the person whose content they are retweeting? Why would I call them to learn more about myself?

Redacted Redacted Redacted
@redacted

One Dev Question with Raymond Chen – Why did you apply to Microsoft?
https://youtu.be/oL8ymamkEMU #redacted #windows

Want to learn more? Call us at (###) ###-### or send an email to redacted@example.com

Note that a casual glance at the format of the given phone number may make you think it's a United States/Canadian number, but it's not, so readers in the United States should be careful: It likely won't be covered by your "free national long distance" plan.

Maybe I should record a One Dev Minute video about a problem that stumped me, and then I can send them an email and ask for the solution!

Raymond Chen

Follow